A Message from your Student Wellness Program:
Eating Disorders
It’s plausible that the emotional, mental, and physical demands of academia at the advanced levels of scholastic scholarship can indeed be challenging. In this quest to establish and maintain a successful university experience, students might frequently have to make selective sacrifices. For example, one might be asked to place limits on their disposable time, sleep, money, opportunities for satisfying social relationships and deferring personal gratification. These sacrifices may contribute to potential feelings that external forces outside of one’s control are shaping your life and that you have little to say about it. These feelings in turn could result in individuals feeling depressed or may cause you to want to exert whatever control you have. For some people, this might involve exhibiting an influence on controlling their weight, their looks and body shape.

In recent times, there’s been a noticeable resurgence in the prevalence of eating disorders in young adults; both male and female. It can prove to be an insidious disorder. Even if successfully treated, it may resurface when a person is stressed. If left untreated, it can prove highly deleterious to a person’s long term emotional health. Listed below are some basic facts about eating disorders as follows:

If you have concerns about your eating habits, please do not hesitate to contact the SWP for assistance at 732-235-5933 to schedule an appointment (day or evening).
